

Important Factors that Contribute to Website Cost

With competing sites appearing everyday, a business needs to work harder to differentiate its products and services from the competition. When trying to budget web design costs there are a number of factors to consider:

- Is this a brand new site or a redesign?
- How prepared are you – do you have a detailed requirements document?
- Do you need a blog or content management functionality?
- Do you have graphics already created for the site?
- How are you planning on servicing mobile customers?
- Do you need multimedia (Flash, video, etc.) on the site?
- How much content do you have and how much do you need created?
- Do you need other special features like social media channels, SEO, ecommerce, or something else?
- Who is going to maintain the site after it has been launched?
